Small mesh sections are rather bulky and provided difficulty in working with such product, and small blocks of foam were subject to breakage, not to mention their excessively tight fit into relatively narrow areas of the bowls on which they were to be used. A very successful filling material for commercial use is now available in small rectangular solid blocks of polyethylene foam having a density of about 40 pounds per cubic foot. These blocks are sold in packs containing for example eight such blocks, and it is not uncommon for such a block weighing up to about five pounds to be removed from its packaging and placed into a bowl, either by hand or with the use of a suitable tool. A problem arises in removing such
